EPA Budget Update: Senate appropriators quickly advanced by voice vote this morning a $35.9 billion fiscal 2019 spending bill for EPA, the Interior Department and related agencies, with bipartisan consensus and without any new "poison pill riders." Like their House counterparts, Senate appropriators rejected the Trump administration's bid to slash EPA's budget by almost $2 billion. Instead, the measure approved today would keep the agency's base allocation at this year's level of $8.05 billion. Programs like the Great Lakes Restoration Initiative, Chesapeake Bay cleanup and Diesel Emissions Reduction Act grants would largely be maintained at existing thresholds, albeit with some tweaks, according to a subcommittee staffer. The Drinking Water State Resolving Fund would receive $1.16 billion under the bill, while the Clean Water State Revolving Fund would get $1.7 billion. Senate appropriators also carved out $63 million in fiscal 2019 for the Water Infrastructure Finance and Innovation Act. The bill would renew more than $770 million in added money for water infrastructure projects to bring total spending on EPA — at least as summarized by subcommittee Democrats — to about $8.8 billion. The measure rejects the White House's request for funding for buyouts to continue reducing EPA's workforce, according to that summary. The Senate bill also rejects the administration's recommendation to cut the agency's research budget by 45 percent, grants by 48 percent, and regulatory and enforcement programs by 25 percent, according to the Democratic summary. The Senate-EPA Interior subcommittee released only a summary June 12th of its fiscal 2019 spending bill, with actual bill text to be released June 14th when the full Appropriations Committee takes up the measure. - Greenwire
